"I've often thought that a lot of awards you get are made-up deals so you'll come to the dinners. Of course, there are others that have merit. I won the first Fred Hutchinson Award. Its for courage. He was a pitcher, and, later a manager in the majors. He had cancer, but he never let us feel sorry for him. He made us feel good just because we knew him. I truly appreciate that award. It's one of my favorites."

1956 Babe Ruth Sultan of Swat Award

Prominently positioned in the center of the Mantle showcase, the striking Sultan of Swat crown was one of Mickey Mantle's most treasured possessions. Indeed, when one looks back through the countless books and articles written about Mickey's career, the many photos of the baseball legend wearing this crown provides visual proof of his feelings for the award.

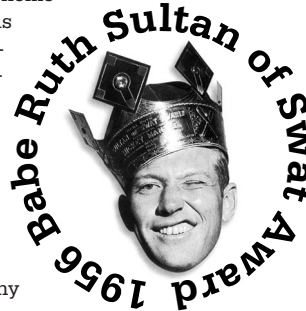

The history of the Babe Ruth Sultan of Swat Award is as follows. The Award was conceived to honor the ball player with the greatest slugging average—an average that combined home runs and runs batted in. Joe Dimaggio was quoted as saying that this was “the greatest award in baseball.” The first presentation of the Award was made in January, 1957 in recognition of accomplishments made in the 1956 baseball season. The recipient was Mickey Mantle.

Importantly, therefore, the very crown being offered at this event was in fact the first crown created for an award that ultimately was won through the years by many of the greatest names that ever played the game.

The Award was annually presented at a banquet in Baltimore where an average of 2,500 people attended in fund raising efforts for the Johns Hopkins Children's Hospital.

This first crown was crafted for the occasion by S & N Katz, a fine jewelry firm in Baltimore. It was crafted from jeweler's grade brass. Lettering is both engraved and applied to the base of the crown-shaped award. The Award contains its original “jewels” and red velvet center. It reads “Babe Ruth – Sultan of Swat Award – presented to Mickey Mantle For Outstanding Batting Achievement – 1956 – Maryland Professional Baseball Players Association.” On the rear of the crown, the engraved lettering lists Mick's 1956 accomplishments: Home Runs 52; Runs Batted In 130; Batting Average .353. It also cites Mickey as a member of the Champion 1956 New York Yankees. Crossed bats and baseballs also adorn the crown.

Mickey Mantle was the first to win this award. The Sultan of Swat Award in this form continued to be given out for ten additional years.

The recipients were: Ted Williams '57, Ernie Banks '58, Eddie Mathews '59, Roger Maris '60 & '61, Willie Mays '62, Hank Aaron '63, Harmon Killebrew '64, Willie Mays '65, and Frank Robinson '66. Following 1966, the Award changed names to the Babe Ruth Award and was awarded to players on a lifetime achievement basis. Decades later, Mickey Mantle was to win his second “crown,” for the overall feats he achieved throughout his career. Three examples of these crowns are on display in the Baseball Hall of Fame including Hank Aaron's crown.
